PARTIALITY?

Monte Ginnings

Imagine a journalist writing a biography of a great man. He had done extensive research into the man's life, and one night the great man invited the writer to his home to eat dinner with him and his five daughters who had grown up to be beautiful, talented women. The man had told the girls to be candid and open in answering the biographer's questions. And the writer was captivated by all five of these charming, vivacious ladies.

Among his questions, he asked all of them. "During your years of growing up and even now, has your Father been partial to one of you? Have you ever sensed that one of you is his favorite?"

The five suddenly stopped eating and looked around the table at each other with what the writer thought was an uneasy acknowledgment of a special secret. He assumed that he had finally found a flaw in the great man, and it was partiality. But then the daughters looked at the writer and replied. "Yes," they all said at once, "I am."

Then the father joined the five in joyous laughter.

We often make the point that God is impartial. (Acts 10:34; Romans 2:11) That in a way is negative; if God has no special favorites, then all are his favorites. The infinite love of God makes it possible for Him to love us all without partiality.

I am the Father's favorite. And you are, too.
